

Delightful, evocative and lyrical

By Shamsad Mortuza

Laila Sharmeen is delightful, evocative and lyrical. She has the simplicity of a child and the intensity of a philosopher. Her work is dominated by a childlike doodling. It doesn't matter whether she is using etching, water-colour, mixed media or acrylic paint, her works demonstrate an artist whose sole concern seems to be devising some playful cultural codes that are intrinsically related to the stories emanated from essential Bengali hearts and psyche. She then invites her viewers to decode those stories—rather her world behind the words and lines that form her composition. Quite characteristically, she leaves out ample space in her work as if she wants her audience to fill in the blank with their own imagination.

While there is an urgency to return to a mythic past, there is also a foreboding of the future. The ominous presence of Madame Sosostris, the clairvoyant who features in T.S. Eliot's The Wasteland, thus foreshadows her vision of Bengal. Laila's love for her country, her desire for upholding the simplicity and beauty of Bengal before an international audience are perhaps problematised by her keenness to incorporate western ideas, particularly those of the high modernists. Her obsession with Eliot and Baudelaire perpetuates a surprisingly traditional misogyny that demands careful analysis. I use the word 'misogyny' with caution, particularly because she titles her work with a clarion call for peace: "Shantih, Shantih, Shantih" (albeit with an Eliotesque allusion to Datta dayadhvam Damyata).

Laila is visibly perturbed by the materialistic greed and alienation of modern man. Her stay in the US has made her even more so. In her video installation, "Golden Stick/Silver Stick", she thus romanticises a sleeping beauty who is waiting for her saviour. "The model in the video actually represents me who does not want to wake up until there are better days," a beaming Sharmeen explains. "The sleep of course is metaphorical of an incubation period." Just in the traditional Bengal folktale in which the prince needs to change the position of the sticks in order to awaken the princess, the artist also longs for a change in society (no wonder, Lazarus is a dominant figure in her work). However, as a conscious citizen, she knows that her desired change can only come through by the ones who know the right code and the correct protocol of changes.

Laila is keenly conscious of many of social changes of modern times that are not healthy or natural. They do not have the essentials for sustenance of humanity. The corrupt politicians and the religious bigots have contaminated her view of the world. At the same time the artificiality of modern life is equally to be blamed. "I find the presence of the artificial garden ornaments in American lawns quite symbolic of their existence. Somehow the Americans have inculcated a sense of artificiality in everything that is normal. It is not an overstatement to say that America has become a plastic society." No wonder, Laila, who has returned from a series of group art exhibitions in the US, has gained a fresh perspective from her exhibitions at World Fine Art Gallery and Soho in New York; Armory Art Centre in Florida. The exhibitions have given her an opportunity to understand her own work as well as to redefine her scope as an artist. She presented her work alongside with 31 other artists from all over the world in an exhibition, titled, "The Edge! International All Media Exhibition, October 17 - November 7, 2008."

Laila seems to be quite proud of the recognition that she has received of her video installations. "Madness and Civilization" has a Foucauldian touch in which she graphically portrays the blood of a freshly slaughtered pigeons. When asked whether she got any angry response from the animal rights group, she retorted by saying, "My purpose is to show the cruelty in the world. To say that cruelty does not exist will actually defeat the purpose of the animal rights activists."
